Compulsory REVISION comments	In this article, the authors aim to determine trends in tourism demand in Indonesia and to understand how to restore tourism in the aftermath of the Covid-19 pandemic. To achieve this goal, they conducted a quantitative study in Indonesia between March and April 2020. Data were collected through surveys via social media broadcast messages, with 100 respondents. To analyse the results, the authors used descriptive statistics in the data analysis technique. The authors reach the following conclusions: the decrease in the number of domestic tourists is less than that of foreign tourists, the country's natural and culinary tourist destinations are the most popular, especially for short trips, and that the desire to travel is more positive after the Covid-19 pandemic. The theoretical implication of this study is that catastrophic diseases such as Covid-19 have a significant impact on tourist visits and demand.
