Compulsory REVISION comments	This article addresses an interesting topic and shows that it is essential to train graduate teaching assistants (GTA). This article has many strengths. For example, the structure of the article is appropriate, and despite the punctuation problems, the way this article is written is considered appropriate. In the discussion section, the findings of this article are discussed in detail. However, this article has a fundamental scientific critique and that is the research design. This research is action research, but the criteria of action research have not been followed in this research. In the results section, a series of goals for the training content have been considered, which could be used as criteria for measuring the success of the ADDIE model for designing training programs for GTAs.
